How Serious is Senioritis?

Senioritis. Senior Slump. Senior Slide. Senior Slack. Whatever you call it, the result is the same. Seniors who have a lot on their minds, who are worried about their futures or how they are going to pay for college or those just tired of working hard, breeze through the last part of the year with little or no effort. And sometimes the consequences are serious:

- ▶▶ Student fails to graduate from high school
- ▶▶ Colleges can revoke admission offers and scholarships
- ▶▶ Nearly one-third of students entering college need remediation because they can't keep up with the challenging curriculum

Senioritis has been around for ages, however we might be more aware of it because of the larger number of students who are adversely affected as a result of their poor performance. More and more colleges are withdrawing offers of admission after seeing a student's senior year grades. When a student is initially offered admission, acceptance letters include warnings to students such as, "Your admission is contingent on your continued successful performance." So, when the senior grades are reported and they are not up to their standards, the offer of admission is revoked. In most cases a student will have to discuss the situation with an admissions officer and provide a reasonable explanation of the turn of events. Students who are allowed to enroll may find themselves on academic probation or under the watchful scrutiny from the College, even before setting foot in the door.

Another factor which has brought more light to senioritis is the increased participation in early admission programs. Some students take advantage of the fact that their college search is over by January 1st and they coast through the rest of the year assuming that nothing will happen to their acceptance if their grades are not up to par.

The government thinks things have gotten so bad that in 2001 The National Commission on the High School Senior Year was established. It reported that students need to be better prepared for college and an increasingly complex world of work. Students also should enroll in more rigorous academic programs which provide greater economic returns and ensure that Americans possess high levels of literacy, numeracy logic and the capacity to think critically. The Commission felt that by approaching the problem through a three prong approach - creating a more unified system of education Pre-K through 4 years of college, raising the achievement bar and providing more alternatives in the senior year, that the concerns over senior year decline will be reduced. Senior capstone projects, the development of meaningful internships and the opportunities to take college level courses are only some of the suggestions made to traditional approaches to educating seniors.

There is no doubt that the last year of high school is difficult for most seniors. The thought of going to college or into the working world, leaving their family and general uncertainty about their future should cause some anxiety. However, some students push the envelope by completely shutting down. A study by UCLA reports that 40% of students claim they are frequently bored in class during their senior year as compared to 35% in 1985. This trend is of concern.

For students who wish to avoid this phenomenon, here are some strategies to help:

- ▶▶ Plan ahead & stay organized - Seniors should know what activities they plan on being a part of and what the demands of their senior year will be. By planning ahead and knowing what is due and when, they can alleviate some of the stress associated with senior year which might result in slacking off.
- ▶▶ Maintain a challenging courseload - By taking courses that keeps one motivated and challenged, there is less of a tendency to slack. Also, for honors and Advanced Placement courses, where a high score on the AP exam may lead to college credit, students are less likely to let their grades slip.
- ▶▶ Stay active and involved - Volunteer work, school activities and sports will help students stay focused. Internships or career focused opportunities (i.e. - job shadow) will also help provide motivation as well as meaningful career-related experience.
- ▶▶ Try out college early - If you are ready for the challenge of college, try taking a college course. Online opportunities can provide even more options than those offered on campus.
- ▶▶ Talk it out - Seniors have many adults (counselors, teachers and parents) as well as their peers who have been through similar situations. By talking about their feelings with others, it will feel like a load is being lifted off their shoulders and thus provide some immediate relief.
